Wholesale used-car prices drop more than 3% in September

Black Book's retention index fell 3.1% month-over-month, and the firm expects the slide to run through the fourth quarter

BY AUTO REMARKETING STAFF

The decline in wholesale vehicle prices grew steeper in September, and that downturn is likely to continue through the fourth quarter, according to the latest analysis from Black Book.

On Monday, the firm released its latest Used Vehicle Retention Index, which fell 3.1% month-over-month in September and dropped 3.3% year-over-year. Granted, the decrease was not uniform, says Laura Wehunt, Black Book's vice president of data & analytics.

ITOCHU invests in MOTER again to leverage connected-car technology

If you didn't believe the modern vehicles you're financing, retailing or repairing are smartphones rolling on four wheels, perhaps this investment announcement will sway your opinion. MOTER Technologies, an AI-powered insurtech delivering a connected-vehicle data platform, said it gained an additional strategic investment from ITOCHU Corp., one of Japan's leading general trading companies.

With AI agent adoption growing, IgniteUps.ai rolls out one with critical dealership tasks in mind

The company introduced NEXUS, designed to be an automotive AI performance manager built to orchestrate a dealership's connected AI workforce and execute real work across its systems. "Every dealership manager has asked, 'What can we do to sell a car today?' NEXUS is built to help answer that question and then help execute," founder and CEO Chris Martinez said.

COMMENTARY: Dealers don't have an inventory problem; they have a decision problem

The past several years reshaped the economics of automotive retail, creating operating conditions that were never likely to last. Dealers who thrived on thin supply and outsized margins are now addressing a harder environment: rising floorplan costs, more price-sensitive consumers and compressed per-vehicle gross. The ones who outperform will recognize when a vehicle is starting to show signs of risk, and act while there are still options.
